HOT WEATHER WORK.

Did you get the canning outfit? Even though you have a small supply of fruits and vegetables, the canning outfit will pay for itself as results are much better and there will be fewer cans to empty because spoiled.

Mrs. H. J. sends us the following for canning string beans, and says a late planting of beans will mature enough for a shelf full of jars.

String and break the green bean pods, just as you would for the table. Measure and put to cook in an enameled or granite wear vessel, and let boil for twenty minutes, then, to every quart measured before cooking and one teaspoonful of salt, cook twenty minutes longer, then fill self-cleaning jars closely, but the packing must be done by shaking and and jarring instead of pressing. Fill the cans to two inches below the top of the jar, filling all air spaces; slash filling the jar to overflowing with boiling vinegar, and seal at once. The jars should always be tested for leakage between the metal cap and the jar. Wrap each can in newspaper to keep from the light. When used, pour off the liquid, rinse in cold water and cook as you would fresh beans.

In making preserves in which fresh lemon is to be used, slice the lemon thin, remove the seeds and cook in clear water until it is tender, then add to the other things. If cooked in sugar with the other ingredients, it will be hard and tough.

If made carefully, nothing is nicer than preserves made of watermelon rinds, with a sliced lemon added. To prevent peaches that are being preserved from boiling to pieces, let them steep in water in which one heaping teaspoonful of soda to a gallon of water has been added. Cover the peaches with the water. Treat apples the same; but sweet apples are better for preserves. Be sure to cover the tops of your jelly with melted paraffin as soon as the jelly cools. This will prevent mold.
